#introduction #blogpost #informative #factual #writer's block ~A problem that usually only affects writers and can cause them to get little or no work done. It is said to be caused by deep self-doubt and fears of failure. The causes can vary depending on the person. However, it usually comes from a lack of confidence and will and the need to write or draw something in order to overcome these issues. Writing can often seem like a solitary task at times, but there is nothing more rewarding than when someone finds the story behind the words and finds inspiration in them. Many people will refuse to write because they don't think they're good enough, which can lead them to feel that the only way out is to give up entirely. However, there are plenty of ways that you can overcome writer's block and enjoy creating new pieces of work without getting too frustrated by editing and re-writing your work so many times.

Fiction writing is a craft. It can take weeks or months to finish a piece of fiction, just the same as beauty takes time to be achieved. People who are being creative often have anxiety about being able to share what they have written with other people. Writing is often seen as an individual's only way of sharing their thoughts, so this can cause writer's block because it can feel like it will result in others not understanding your work. Writing is an extension of your mind - how do I get my ideas out of my head and onto the page? This isn't easy for everyone, but with practice you will find that you will be able to open up more and show your true self on the page. As writers, we often need to seek inspiration and write things that we're passionate about. Think about what you like and dislike and write your thoughts down regularly. You will then be able to get your thoughts out of your head and onto the page. Some people don't even need to write their ideas down - many writers will just think in their heads when they are trying to come up with their next idea. This is much more accessible for some authors, but if you find that you can't tell your stories just in your head, writing things down regularly will help you get them out of there so you can use them when creating works in the future. It's important to not let yourself get to a stage where you're editing and re-writing your story so many times that you never actually finish it. Get your main idea out there first and then edit as you go along. You can't expect to get your story 100% right first time - even the most successful authors will tell you that they've edited their work so many times that they've made minor errors. If it gets too much, leave it alone for a day or two and come back.
