

Personal narrative essay

Rhetoric in my world today is everywhere. Depending on your morning routine, can determine right away if you are viewing rhetoric on your phone. I am going to show you my viewpoint of rhetoric and how I may be influenced by the things that I see. I start my day by waking up in my dorm room. When I wake up, I do not look at my phone right away because each morning I wake up an hour before my class starts, so I need to make sure that I have enough time first before I go on my phone. When I go and take a shower, I see on the doors that there is a sign on that's which days and at what time the bathroom will get clean which means that I won't be able to go into the bathroom at these times. When I am finish, I go back into my room and put on my clothes. Normally I take a 30-minute shower and it takes me 10 minutes to do my hair, so I have about 5-8 minutes to go on my phone before I must leave for class. When I go on my phone, I see that my boyfriend has sent me some memes from Facebook and twitter to watch. The memes he sends me make me laugh and this has become our thing. When I am done with those I go to snapchat and look at snaps people have sent me, but I also look at people's stories. While looking at people stories there are advertisements that play in between each story. Normally I see advertainments about sprint and 4G about trying to get me to switch to their plan. After I am done its time for me to leave to go to class. As I am walking down the hall, I see that the new bulletin board of the month is now up and is giving other residents and I motivation for the month. As I go further down the halls, I see the flyers that are decorating the walls by the water fountain. One says cookies and mingle another is talking about floor meetings and the last flyer that I see is talking about a trip to Spain. A lot of these flyers have eye catching designs and bright colors, so that when people walk by them, they can easily see the time, date and where the event is going to be held. When I finally make it out the front door I don't usually go on my phone, but sometimes I do listen to music while I am walking. When I make my way to class depending on what day it is, I may have a few minutes to go on my phone and check Instagram since I was not able to before I left the dorms. When I go on Instagram, I see that my friend Erin has finally posted a new post in about 4 months. I also go and look at memes that I think are funny, so that I can send off to my boyfriend for him to see in the morning when he wakes up. I watch my professors PowerPoint lecture. After the lecture is done, I head to Jamba juice right after which is in the atrium. The atrium is the hub for a lot of advertisements. I see one about a CCIM super party, a sale for books and posters and people having tables set up. When I get to Jamba juice, they are always having a new special drink to try I always get sucked into one of them, so today I tried the new mango drink with oat milk and sat down and started to work on some of my homework.
