

“Bob’s Burgers” is a friendly cartoon show about a family that works at a burger joint.

“Bob’s Burgers” was created by Loren Bouchard in 2011 and is currently on its 12th season with a film released this year.

The show has a fun formula that never gets old with the show focusing on the kid’s journey through middle school and the parent’s work. Some episodes have their stories collide or them having an adventure together.

Character dynamics throughout the show are absolutely perfect and the side characters bring opportunities of unique storytelling. The show is great for the family as it has appeal to all ages because of the relatability of the characters.

We have children in the show who act down-to-earth which brings a dimension of realism into a show that already has realistic plotlines. We also see them go through puberty which brings a relatability factor to anyone who watches and could appreciate it.

Their parents are also realistic with their character designs and voice actors making them likeable characters. Their plotlines always have them stepping out of their comfort zones in order for them to get through their day to day which their children learn from.

The side characters bring a weird but wondrous element to the family’s lives that add to the family’s dynamics. They all create a fantastical sense of worldbuilding that shows builds off of really well.

There is great representation for minorities including some of the LGBTQ+ and POC side characters that have shown up throughout the show’s runtime.

The art style of the show has a simplistic structure that helps make the show feel more comforting. The voice acting adds to the playful atmosphere as many of the voice actors do more than one voice and they always bring guest voice actors to do enjoyable characters.

It also has a musical element that rarely shows up but adds an captivating aura that keeps you looking forward to whatever the show will bring. Although the show is welcoming, the show can have mature themes and real life situations that can make the show more authentic.

The show has many small elements that all add up to bring a warm atmosphere to the show with one of my favorites being the “Burger of the Day” that changes every episode.

Overall I consider this show to be my ultimate comfort show because of how I can resonate with the character’s experiences in life. The show presents an accessible world that sometimes has mature elements in it.
